P

The data that we generate daily through our behavior has become a precious resource. Around the world, new data is collected, analysed and evaluated for scientific, economic or political purposes without us having any influence over it. We've arrived in digital Big Data and are forced to do a daily balancing act between protecting our privacy on the one hand and on the other the self-understanding of the freedom to which the Internet, social media and networks belong. Who do we communicate with? Which friends should we still know? Where's the next vacation destination? How healthy are we and how do we move through the city? Do we offer this information voluntarily by using the preferences laid out for us in WhatsApp, Facebook, booking sites, step counters or GPS-based navigation devices? Behind attractively designed interfaces, a massive market hides in an as of yet mostly legally ambiguous and continuously growing space.

Surveillance has long been a major issue in society. Sociologists, psychologists, lawyers, politicians and artists address the different forms of surveillance and their effects on individuals and entire groups. They don't merely concentrate on issues of privacy and the potential threat to individuals through governmental and private surveillance, but rather critically and playfully deal with the various forms of daily surveillance as constitutive part of our social lives. Given this universal development, the question arises: What effect does this have on us? How are these developments reflected in artistic works? And how can contemporary art and media theory contribute to a better understanding of our modern surveillance society?

With the series Watched! – Surveillance Art & Photography C/O Berlin and the Deutsche Börse Photography Foundation address the different forms of surveillance and their effects and present different commentaries and reactions from the perspective of contemporary art and media experts.
